Facilitated by Kyle Bender

If you've watched the show Stranger Things, and you grew up in the 80's, the show makes sense. As a child of the 80's, my parents never knew where I was or what I was doing as long as I was home by dinner. If you grew up in a more recent decade, you probably watch the show asking, "where are these kids parents?" If the setting of the show was today, it wouldn't make sense. Families don't operate that way anymore.

The sentiment applies to youth ministry. Too many of our models and methods are for a different generation and we must let go of the conventional programming of the past and reimagine ministry for today.

If your definition of youth ministry is a program at a certain time on a certain night of the week, you (and your church) are most likely not thrilled with the results you are getting.

If you are wondering why it seems that everything in the life of families is more important than church and you feel like you are fighting for the attention of students and parents - you are not alone.

If you are wondering if the model of youth ministry is even answering the questions young people have as they navigate the world in the 2020's, let's talk about it.

Space is Limited to 12 Participants*

This cohort will explore the current landscape of ministry to students, what's not working and what is, to discover together what we can learn and apply to our local context.

We will borrow from helpful voices who are exploring these questions. We will take a look at courageous leaders who are doing new things and building faith in the next generation. We will navigate together how to move on from forcing old models that no longer work to exploring the places young people need ministry to show up the most.

Additionally, we will work to unlock the collective wisdom of the group. You are the ones working in the ministry day in and day out, in different contexts and with hard earned wisdom of walking alongside your communities. The goal of this cohort will be to draw upon that collective wisdom and begin to reimagine a future of student ministry you can implement in your context.
